3) A free seat at CES

My favourite Digit memory has to be the 2021 CES coverage, which I got for free. CES always felt like something that happened far away, in another part of the world, and here was the whole of it laid out for me without having to pay a rupee for the privilege. I remember going through every piece of that coverage and feeling like I had a seat at the show. For a reader my age, that kind of access is not a small thing, and it is why I kept coming back.

4) Bring back the CD

The CD with Digit is a must — that is where all the new software came from, issue after issue, and it is the thing I miss most. I would like to see it come back, carrying new software every month the way it once did. And please keep covering everything new across IT: phones, laptops, cars, EVs, all of it. The range of things worth writing about has only grown since I started reading in the early 2000s, and I would like Digit to keep pace with every bit of it.

5) The TV insights

What I keep coming back for are the TV insights. Buying a television is one of those decisions where it is very easy to be talked into something you do not need, and the specification sheet on its own tells you almost nothing useful. Digit's coverage cuts through that. It explains what actually matters in a panel, what is only marketing language, and what you will genuinely notice once the set is sitting in your living room. I am a new reader, but that is the section I look for first every time.

6) Every time I saw the magazine

There isn't one single memory for me — it is every single time I saw the magazine. I have been reading since the Chip days, and across all those years the feeling has never really changed. Spotting a new issue on the stand still does something to me. The name on the cover changed, the design changed, the technology inside changed completely, but that small moment of picking it up and knowing there is something new waiting inside has stayed exactly the same. Nothing but love for what you do.
