ADIEU, LOGOS

5 RESTRAINT REIGNS

We are moving beyond the obsession with logos. Look at The Row, Loro Piana, Brunello Cucinelli, and Jil Sander. Their appeal comes from material, proportion, construction, and restraint, rather than putting the name on everything. The Row, in particular, has become synonymous with a very considered approach to luxury. The consumer today wants to look closer. Who made it? What is the fabric? How does it feel? Why is this particular piece worth keeping? When the making is exceptional, you don't need to shout the name across the room. The object begins to speak for itself.

6 SUBSTANCE STUMPS SUPERFICIAL

The next generation of luxury consumers will increasingly buy things that have a reason to exist. Take Loewe's Puzzle bag. It became recognisable because of its construction and design language, not simply because it carried a logo. Or Bottega Veneta, whose Intrecciato technique has become as identifiable as the brand name itself. That is the interesting shift—luxury is no longer about simply owning something expensive but about understanding why this particular object, material, technique or story deserves a place in your life. While the product still matters, meaning gives it longevity.
