DESIRABLE DRAPES

9 EMBRACING MOVEMENT

I'm extremely happy to see the drape making a comeback. There's something incredibly sensual about fabric that moves with the body. Alaïa understands this beautifully through sculptural, body-conscious constructions, while Issey Miyake spent decades exploring the relationship between fabric, movement, and the human form. Draping is almost instinctive in India—we have lived with it for centuries. What is interesting now is seeing designers around the world rediscover that freedom. The drape gives clothing movement, ease, and a certain intelligence. It doesn't need much else.

LOOKING EAST

10 NEW REGIONAL FOCUS

West Asia is becoming much more than a luxury market. It is transforming into a cultural force in its own right. Ashi Studio is a fascinating example. Mohammed Ashi became the first Gulf designer to join the official Paris Haute Couture calendar in 2023, and his sculptural couture has increasingly become part of the global red-carpet conversation. His Fall 2026 couture collection continued that language of spectacle and craftsmanship. Even more fascinating is the strong sense of regional identity in the designs, with minimal interest in being confined by geography. It's rooted yet completely global at the same time. ■
