

how he wants to present himself to the world, and whether he appreciates craftsmanship over logos.

"Men today travel more, consume global fashion, and appreciate quieter forms of luxury. Proportions are perfect, fabrics exceptional, and fit impeccable. That's the balance we strive for — softer tailoring with classic foundations."

THE BEST OF BOTH WORLDS

Abhishek Advani – Advani London

A young Abhishek Advani often visited Shanghai Tang, a Chinese-inspired fashion house in Central London that had made an entire culture desirable to the rest of the world. He remembers thinking, "Where's India's version of this?"

For the founder of Advani London, menswear was the obvious place to start—partly because he had always been quietly obsessed with it but primarily as couture, in the menswear lexicon, is tailoring. His aesthetic now lies in combining the precision of English tailoring—sharp construction, perfect silhouettes, and restraint—with the textile and craft legacies of India, marked by the richness of colour, handwork, and history.

"Together, they produce something neither tradition could arrive at alone: a wardrobe as considered as it is confident, equally at ease in London and Mumbai because it is never really choosing between them," the designer explains.

A look at the wardrobes of Arvind Vijay Mohan, Founder of Artery India, and art curator Amin Jaffer would clue one into Advani's mood board for style.

"I find their sartorial choices genuinely inspiring," he shares. "Ishaan Khatter and Vedang Raina always wear something worth a second look. And on the global red carpet, Timothée Chalamet and Jacob Elordi never fail to impress."

On the sartor's client wishlist is model-actor Paul Anthony Kelly, which, to him, would mean getting to play with the look of JF Kennedy Jr., "arguably one of the most effortlessly stylish men America has ever produced. That particular blend of Ivy League ease and quiet confidence is the kind of wardrobe I'd love to build on!"

Above: Bespoke menswear tailors like Tenassi Mumbai and Advani London excel in traditional English tailoring, crafting timeless suits and separates with precision and structure