PIAGET POLO 79

1 THE RETURN OF THE TWO-TONE

Once treated as a safe middle-ground, the two-tone is now making a case for itself in the Piaget Polo 79. The edgy gold-on-gold revives the yellow-and-white-gold configuration of the original era without becoming nostalgic. Alternating gadroons run across the case, dial, and bracelet, while the ultra-thin micro-rotor movement keeps the profile elegant. Glamorous, technically credible, and unmistakably Piaget, the rare revival strengthens the original idea rather than merely copying it.

ROLEX LAND-DWELLER

2 REVIVING THE INTEGRATED BRACELET

Integrated-bracelet watches have emerged as one of 2026's defining horology trends, with Patek Philippe, Vacheron Constantin, Chopard, and IWC all returning to the format. Rolex's Land-Dweller, launched in 2025, is perhaps the most interesting of the lot. Its Flat Jubilee bracelet is integral to the case, the honeycomb dial combines traditional finishing with laser work, and calibre 7135 introduces the Dynapulse escapement and a high-frequency architecture. The white-Rolesor reference is the clearest everyday expression of the idea. It is recognisably Rolex, yet technically and visually distinct enough to begin a new chapter.

BALTIC PRISMIC STONE PIETERSITE

3 BACK TO THE STONE AGE

Stone dials are showing up again across the world of horology, from Piaget's ornamental-stone pieces and Rolex's tiger-iron GMT-Master II to more accessible offerings from manufacturers like Dennison and Baltic. The Baltic Prismic Stone Pietersite gives the stone-dial revival a thoughtful mechanical entry point. Every pietersite dial has its own movement and colour, while the 36mm case combines steel with titanium and keeps the thickness to 9.2mm. Dauphine hands, small seconds, and a visible Swiss hand-wound movement supply the detail. At roughly €1,300, it offers real material personality and pleasing proportions without pretending to be a miniature version of a far more expensive watch.

BREGUET CLASSIQUE SOUSCRIPTION

4 THE 'DRESSED UP' TIMEPIECE

The dress watch is finding its way back into conversation. Cartier has unveiled a new Santos-Dumont in platinum and yellow gold, JLC has returned to classic proportions with its Master Control Chronomètre, and Blancpain has taken the Villeret Ultraplate down to 38mm. Breguet's Classique Souscription goes further with a single blued hand sweeping across a Grand Feu enamel dial, with proportions, numerals and finishing doing the talking. Created for the maison's 250th anniversary with a 40mm Breguet-gold case, and a hand-wound VS00 calibre giving it 96 hours of reserve. After recent complications, this kind of pared-back watch feels refreshing.
