On the Grape's Trail

A wine trail can be as much about the journey as the drink itself. From trains and trams to boats, bicycles, scenic drives, and even hot air balloons, these routes offer varied memorable ways to explore the world's most renowned wine-producing regions.

BY SHALINI SINGH

What do you picture when you think of wine trails? A drive between vineyards, toggling between wineries and moving on to the next? But some wine regions have figured out something better. The journey itself can be part of the wine experience.

You can travel through vineyards by train, tram, boat, bicycle or even hot-air balloon. Some routes take you through dramatic landscapes, others connect historic villages, restaurants and wine estates. And, importantly, they solve one of the biggest problems with wine travel—how do you taste without worrying about who is driving?

Here are some of the best wine trails.

