build, an invitation-only service that lets clients collaborate with designers, engineers and artisans to create one-of-a-kind cars. "Our clients can come to us with a blank paper. What you have is a highly bespoke rolling automotive art," says Jenkins.

Drawing on India's rich heritage of craft, culture and storytelling, Italian supercar maker Ferrari recently partnered with Ahmedabad-based National Institute of Design to create 10 special digital configurations for Indian customers. These include five for Ferrari 12Cilindri and five for Ferrari Purosangue. The Purosangue celebrates India's capital city Delhi while the 12Cilindri reflects the heritage and spirituality of the city of Varanasi.

"Indian customers start personalisation with the colour and stitching. Then they want more," Charles Antoine Geneste, Head of Southeast Asia at Ferrari, tells BT. "Around 99% of our cars are one-off," he adds.

For many, the process is rooted in their personal association with the brand. "Every client we meet has a story with Ferrari. One of the ways they connect with Ferrari is personalisation," says Aayush Tiwari, Country Manager, India, Ferrari. Some gift a Ferrari to their children at their wedding, using the gift to express the story of their relationship, says Tiwari. Some even travel to Ferrari headquarters in Maranello, Italy, to explore the personalisation options. However, access to these appointments is limited.

The waiting time of around 18 months gives customers time to revisit their bespoke requests. "Some come back after a while on some decisions they took to modify the way you have configured the car," says Francesco Bianchi, President, Far and Middle East, of Ferrari.

Dinesh Thakkar, the founder and chairman of stock-broking company Angel One who recently added the Ferrari 12Cilindri Spider to his collection, could not travel to Maranello. However, the Ferrari dealership in Mumbai was able to send samples of leather and paint, among other things, to his home. "What makes this one especially personal is the configuration—Nero Purosangue, Rosso Giudecca Alcantara, bespoke livery, Dreamline design, airbrushed details and plenty of other touches chosen to make it truly my own," says Thakkar. Nero Purosangue, Rosso Giudecca Alcantara describe a bespoke, high-luxury colour and interior specification found on Ferrari models.
