Tedaldi. Jain also stresses the importance of learning outside the classroom.

Yet specialised education is not the only route into the industry. Gupta argues that client-facing roles in a boutique or luxury hotel can provide valuable early experience. These jobs may offer modest starting pay but they expose employees to customers, commercial decisions, and the standards expected in luxury.

At Luxury Connect Business School, recent graduate starting salaries have been reported at ₹8–11 lakh a year. This is an institute-reported figure, not an independent industry-wide benchmark.

For aspiring professionals, the choice between a specialised luxury qualification, a general management degree and entering the workforce directly depends on their career goals, the experience they already have, and how certain they are about the sector.

Whatever the route, the question is whether the candidate can translate knowledge into performance.

"The number of careers is galloping, not just expanding. Luxury is emotion, experience and storytelling, and these can apply to almost any product"

NITISH JAIN
FOUNDER & PRESIDENT, S. P. JAIN SCHOOL OF GLOBAL MANAGEMENT

WHAT THE WORK LOOKS LIKE

For Aadya Sharma, who works in luxury brand marketing at Magnanimous Group, the career took shape through a combination of previous marketing experience, specialised education, and an internship with Lamborghini.

But the reality of the work, she says, is different from the glamour often associated with the sector. It involves deadlines, multitasking, and coordination across time zones.

Sathe's experience at BlackCab Agency Network offers another view of the work. Previous internships helped him speak about actual campaigns during the selection process rather than relying only on classroom learning.

The programme gave him a foundation in brand positioning, customers, and experience. The day-to-day skills, however, developed on the job: turning a rough client brief into something workable, responding calmly when plans change, and keeping several teams aligned.

Sathe sees the country's growing luxury, lifestyle, and hospitality markets as places where he can learn and take on responsibility while the sector continues to develop.

Sharma offers similar advice to students considering an international start. Although Europe can be an attractive destination, she says, competition for suitable roles can be intense, particularly for South Asian applicants. Building professional grounding in India before seeking opportunities abroad may be a more practical route.

INDIA OR OVERSEAS?

International exposure can help students understand how established luxury markets operate, but it does not guarantee an international career.

Tedaldi says graduates from the programme have joined major fashion and hospitality groups, but he stresses that opportunities in Europe depend on more than a qualification. Language can be a significant barrier.

For Sharma, the decision about where to begin should also take account of the opportunities available and the experience a young professional needs to build. For Sathe, India offered the prospect of taking on responsibility in a market still developing its luxury businesses. The choice is, therefore, not simple.

As luxury expands into new categories, the industry needs professionals who can combine commercial acumen, cultural understanding, and customer experience. A strong brand promise may attract customers, but it takes the right people to turn that promise into lasting value. BT