A Platter of Taste

A THALI HAS ALWAYS been more than a plate. It is a small, round country, and everything a food culture loves is arranged along its rim. The Chhint Thali, an exquisite collaboration between interior designer Shalini Misra and British decorative arts house de Gournay, celebrates this culinary tradition, elevating the quintessential Indian dining ritual into an expression of cultivated elegance.

Drawing on the exuberant florals of Indian chintz and the jewelled intricacy of Mughal zardozi, the hand-painted porcelain ensemble is a masterclass in decorative refinement. Delicate botanical sprays, elaborate floral borders and shimmering gold latticework unfold across luminous porcelain, each painstakingly rendered by artisans in Jingdezhen, China's historic porcelain capital.

There is also a sophisticated cultural dialogue at play. Indian chintz, once the obsession of European aristocracy, finds new expression through a British luxury house, translated into Chinese porcelain and returned to the Indian table as an offering of beauty.

Priced at at $1,926 (₹1,83,000), each platter paired with a set of four bowls comes with promise to bring exquisite taste to the guests at the table, much before the meal is served.
