

A Seven-Year Longing

DEEP IN THE Western Ghats, the Karvi flower (Strobilanthes callosa) performs one of nature's most extraordinary rituals. For seven long years, the plant gathers its strength before erupting into a spectacular profusion of violet-blue blossoms, carpeting the hillsides in a fleeting floral extravagance. It is during this brief flowering that bees harvest the nectar for one of India's most elusive honeys.

The result is liquid poetry. Rich, deep gold-green amber and seductively aromatic, Priced between ₹3,500 and ₹5,000 a kg, Karvi honey possesses a complex flavour that transcends ordinary sweetness. Its floral delicacy unfolds into earthy, herbaceous undertones, with a lingering, gently wild finish that speaks unmistakably of its forest origins. Each spoonful carries the untamed character of the landscape from which it comes.

Its rarity is its greatest extravagance. With flowering occurring only once in seven years, authentic Karvi blossom honey is a seasonal treasure, its availability dictated not by commerce but by the rhythms of nature.

In a world where luxury is increasingly manufactured, Karvi honey offers something far more precious: the exquisite privilege of tasting time itself.
