

Q: India's luxury market has traditionally been concentrated in cities such as Mumbai, Delhi, and Bengaluru. Do you see Bvlgari's reach expanding beyond these centres?
A: There are multiple Indias. The cultural roots, approaches to business and types of clientele differ from north to south and east to west. I was in Bengaluru a few days ago, and its approach to business and life is different from Mumbai. Delhi will have a different character again. Bvlgari has different things to offer in each market.

Over the past five years, we have been intentional about building our retail network and clientele in India. We need to acknowledge that a store in Bengaluru may not operate in the same way as one in Delhi because aspirations and approaches to the brand can differ. Delhi may have a more traditional approach, with a stronger connection to jewellery, while Bengaluru may be more technology-oriented and potentially more receptive to men's watches. These are hypotheses, but this is how we are thinking about the market: bringing what Bvlgari stands for while adapting to India's specific characteristics.

"I believe there is a natural connection between Indian culture and Swiss watchmaking because collectors appreciate the local expertise and craftsmanship behind these timepieces"

Q: Will the India-EFTA (European Free Trade Association) trade agreement benefit Bvlgari's watchmaking business?
A: Trade agreements are always positive when they enable brands to reach clientele more freely and improve access to products. The agreement moves in the right direction by offering Indian consumers access to Swiss-made timepieces with the right value
