

1

common price point.

Among the chefs it has brought to India is Slovenia's Ana Roš of Hiša Franko, whose pop-up was priced at ₹50,000 per person. Another prominent visitor has been Chilean chef Rodolfo Guzmán of Boragó, and chef Tako of Gucci Osteria.

Bahl says international chefs are also increasingly interested in visiting India, often combining their events with trips to explore the country's culinary traditions. Roš, for example, spent 15 days in India.

The changing perception of Indian ingredients is significant, too. Where visiting chefs once questioned whether produce of the required quality would be available, Bahl says most ingredients used in Conosh's pop-ups are now sourced locally.

1 NAAR Restaurant situated in the hills of Kasauli. Its multi-course tasting menu, priced at ₹6,900 per person excluding taxes, takes diners on a culinary journey through the Himalayas

2 Ragi pineapple with burnt milk ice cream at NAAR

The phenomenon is also attracting corporate buyers. Luxury automobile companies, banks, financial institutions, and lifestyle brands are increasingly purchasing seats or commissioning private dinners for their customers. "Food is the best form of gifting now. It is highly appreciated because you are gifting an experience and it cannot be re-lived," says Bahl.

The growing appetite for exceptional meals is not confined to international celebrity chefs or metropolitan luxury hotels. Some of India's most sought-after dining experiences are located away from conventional restaurant districts, with diners travelling specifically to visit them.