mechanical timepieces.

"The average age of someone who's buying a watch is going down," he says.

Interestingly, India is also demonstrating strength at price points that have faced pressure internationally. Saboo says demand for watches priced between ₹2 lakh and ₹5 lakh remains particularly robust, driven by aspirational consumers entering the market.

At the higher end, buyers are becoming adventurous. Rather than restricting themselves to familiar international names, collectors are exploring independent manufacturers and specialist watchmakers. Today brands such as H. Moser & Cie., Bell & Ross, Frederique Constant, etc., are gaining popularity.

"India has moved from being a
