ence, domestic luxury-watch brands are also beginning to benefit from the Indian consumer's growing appetite for craftsmanship, exclusivity, and distinctive design.

Titan's luxury brand Nebula is drawing on Indian art, jewellery, and cultural traditions to develop an identity that differs from conventional Swiss watchmaking.

Its collaboration with designer Tarun Tahiliani for the Phool Chadar collection translates the Indian wedding ritual into watches featuring intricate jaali work, Polki-inspired settings, and traditional finishes.

"The luxury consumer here no longer sees Indian identity and global sophistication as opposing ideas," says Kalpana Rangamani, Chief Sales and Marketing Officer, Titan Premium Watches.

Nebula is also advancing beyond ornamental design into complicated mechanical watchmaking. Its JALSA timepiece combines an 18-karat gold flying tourbillon with a hand-painted marble dial inspired by Jaipur's Hawa Mahal. Rangamani believes Indian watchmakers must compete on craftsmanship, engineering, and ownership experience rather than simply position themselves as alternatives to Swiss brands.

Jaipur Watch Company is witnessing a similar change in consumer attitudes. Founder and CEO Gaurav Mehta says that when the company launched in 2013, convincing Indian customers to spend ₹50,000 on a domestic watch was difficult. Today, watches priced between ₹50,000 and ₹1 lakh attract substantial demand, while bespoke creations can cost anywhere from ₹1.5 lakh to
