snowfall felt as if we had come a complete circle from our rainy beginning. Scientists say that each snowflake is different from the other. We felt the same way—so many different people and languages, but all part of the same snowfall and the same nation.

One year ago, when we celebrated the completion of the Bharat Jodo Yatra, I thought we were closing the Yatra. I thought that the journey was over and I was heading back home, and that we will continue to carry the cause forward in different ways. It is true that we have carried the message of love and unity in different ways since then and shall continue to do so. However, upon further reflection, I do not believe the Yatra is over for me. I believe it is still in me and I am still in the Yatra, learning to live with its values and living to learn from the people of my nation.
