A People's Revolution to Reunite India

Mallikarjun Kharge

Padyatras and satyagrahas have held a special significance in India. A padyatra (march) has always served as a means of connecting with the people, understanding their grievances and mobilizing them for a larger cause. Satyagrahas (non-violent resistance), on the other hand, have successfully brought in meaningful sociopolitical change. Both were leveraged to great effect during India's freedom struggle. Both of these powerful instruments converged in Rahul Gandhi's Bharat Jodo Yatra (the Yatra), which successfully united the nation to further the constitutional idea of India.

People need to be heard. They need to feel included. And they need to know that something is being done about what they have expressed about their needs and aspirations. But unfortunately, the government has not delivered on any of these three in the past decade. And so the common man genuinely feels left out. The common people have been desperate for someone to pay heed to them with respect and compassion. And Rahul Gandhi stepped up. He did not just walk the 4,000+ kilometres across twelve states—he walked straight into people's hearts.

Millions of Indians spoke to him, talking about untold tales of suffering because of unemployment, stagnant wages, a stagnant economy that no longer works for all, a pervasive atmosphere of fear and hate, and overall
