At the confluence of the three seas in Kanyakumari, their resounding waves, the serene Gandhi Mandapam, the tranquil memorial of Perunthalaivar Kamarajar, the towering statue of the esteemed Tamil poet Thiruvalluvar and the majestic rock memorial of Swami Vivekananda awaited a historic event. Rahul Gandhi's Bharat Jodo Yatra, poised to exert a substantial impact on India's political, social and cultural landscape, was on the brink of commencement. The atmosphere resonated with undulating waves of people, their voices harmonizing with the rhythmic cadence of the seas. The earnest countenances of the Congress party workers, who had gathered from across the nation, added radiance to the sunlit land. The scene was enchanting, seamlessly aligned with nature, as the tender sea breeze, carrying a soothing humidity, gently embraced the surroundings. A resounding cheer marked Rahul Gandhi's arrival, persisting even as he initiated the Yatra.

Rahul Gandhi sat in contemplation with closed eyes before the urn containing the ashes of Mahatma Gandhi, the revered Father of the Nation. His journey, paralleling that of Mahatma Gandhi, who had traversed the nation in humble third-class train coaches, stirred the conscience of the world with love and non-violence. An invisible historical thread intricately bound them together.

The stretch of road from Kanyakumari to Kashmir is more than mere terrain—it embodies an emotional tapestry woven from the diverse threads of races, religions, languages, cultures, customs and beliefs. It also harbours disparities and oppressions rooted in gender, caste and economic
