In the prevailing landscape, characterized by the ascendancy of ideologies rooted in animosity and violence within the corridors of governmental power, the burden on the populace is escalating. Seeds of acrimony and aggression are swiftly taking root in India, a country endowed with a heritage of harmony among diverse faiths, languages and cultures. In this critical, tragic and seemingly despondent milieu, the leader of a political party undertook an extraordinary journey, surmounting adverse weather conditions, threats to life and physical challenges. With the noble objective of sowing seeds of love against the prevailing backdrop of hatred and violence, the leader traversed the Indian landscape alongside the people. Initially met with scepticism by many, this accomplishment shattered preconceived notions meticulously constructed by the BJP over almost a decade, substantiated by hefty financial investments.

The resilience and unwavering determination displayed throughout the Yatra stand as a testament to the leader's commitment to the cause, offering a glimmer of hope amid challenging circumstances. His expressions of love left an indelible mark wherever his footsteps touched the ground. His millions of followers became messengers, disseminating the message of love far and wide. The common people's mobile-phone cameras triumphed over the media's negative propaganda. With numerous cameras lining both sides of the road, capturing every moment of every kilometre covered, and at least 25,000 people daily recording this historic event, the march of the messenger of love became a spectacle. These recordings, enthusiastically shared on social media, swiftly reached millions of people.

What commenced as a simple yatra of sowing love transformed into a colossal people's movement. Power and opulence, which had long treated people as mere political pawns for almost a decade, were silently challenged by this peaceful march. The refreshing change of addressing a leader affectionately by name, exchanging love and opinions, and departing without gender distinctions were noted. Another vivid image etched into my memory is that of the leader's interactions with children, who brought vibrant liveliness to every scene with their presence and overwhelming warmth. These moments, coupled with the leader lifting children on to his
