shoulders, further enhanced the enchantment of the journey. People now hold the belief that genuine leadership involves walking amid the great flood of people, listening to the heart's voice of the common folk, and confronting the everyday physical and mental challenges faced by them, all while maintaining unwavering determination and refusing to compromise on principles, regardless of encountered obstacles. This march has firmly taken root in the minds of the youth. Additionally, the Yatra also celebrated the arts, serving as cultural and historical documents of this great nation.

The Yatra imparted lessons that surpass the teachings of a lifetime, instilling courage, resilience and hope. The conviction that Rahul Gandhi is the answer to the country's current challenges was further strengthened. The Yatra was not merely a journey—it was a reflection of India's conscience, transcending all barriers. Being a small part of this reflection, a witness to history being made, is something I will take pride in until the end of my life. The Bharat Jodo Yatra revealed, as it did for millions of others, the true essence of Bharat. The spirit of India shall prevail and thrive.

As the march progressed from Punjab, the chill in the air became more pronounced. For someone born in Karur, where the climate remains relatively constant even within Tamil Nadu, adapting to the cold posed a challenge. The weather forecast predicted temperatures plummeting to minus ten degrees by the time we reached Kashmir, prompting me to stock up on winterwear from head to toe. Uncharacteristically, I indulged in extensive clothing purchases during the Yatra, deviating from my usual spending habits. Here, waking up at four in the morning for a bath was a necessity to reach the starting point before six. When questioned in Kerala about the possibility of adjusting the timing, Rahul, who had hinted at potential changes after reaching Maharashtra, appeared to have conveniently forgotten ever having discussed this possibility! Expressing concern to someone striding through extreme cold in just a simple T-shirt and cotton pants seemed futile. It was evident that no climatic extremity could deter his relentless march. The sole objective was to reach Kashmir, come what may.
