The Congress party has a great historical task for not just its own revival, but for the very survival of democratic practices. It needs to aim for an internal organizational transformation, even as it has the pressing task of social change and electoral victories. This by no means is easy, but if there is a conscious effort to connect them, there is no reason why it should not be realized in due course.