through a series of conversations that took place between Rahul Gandhi and gig worker unions and civil society organizations from Rajasthan. These conversations helped explain the context and enabled political commitment for fresh and credible legislation to mediate new working relationships in an emerging sector of work.

It will be interesting to start with contemporary developments and trace them back to the Yatra. On 23 December 2023 (more than a year after the Bharat Jodo Yatra had passed through Telangana), the newly elected chief minister of Telangana, Revanth Reddy, attended a meeting in Hyderabad organized by the All India Professionals' Congress (AIPC), where he announced that the gig workers of Telangana would soon have a gig workers' law. He added that it would be as good as, and improve on, the Rajasthan Platform Based Gig Workers (Registration and Welfare) Act notified on 14 September 2022. This law has made waves not just in India, but across the globe for being one of the first and only laws in the world to have begun to establish legal rights for gig workers.

It would not be wrong to say that the Rajasthan legislation owes its existence to a series of developing dialogues that took place between gig workers, civil society groups and Rahul Gandhi at various points of the Bharat Jodo Yatra. It began in Karnataka and Telangana, when he met agitating and distressed gig workers. It carried on with a couple of interactions almost (two months) later in Rajasthan, where he met gig workers and civil society activists who were suggesting a framework for a social security law in the state to support them.

By the time Rahul Gandhi reached Rajasthan, he had reached out twice or thrice to talk to gig worker representatives and had also been approached by gig workers in different places about the crisis they were facing. He was clearly keen to do something about the problem. At the same time, he was aware that this was an issue that was being discussed in countries across the globe and that aggregators opposed this much-needed regulatory legislative framework. In Rajasthan, during discussions in the padyatra, the social security of gig workers seemed to offer an opportunity for an important legislative breakthrough for workers' welfare, and through that the broader
