In the wake of the last few tumultuous years, India finds itself at the crossroads of unprecedented challenges, grappling with a complex tapestry of social, economic and geopolitical issues. The recent suspension of Members of Parliament, including my own, for seeking a discussion on critical matters such as a security breach and the subsequent arbitrary suspension of colleagues, has become a glaring manifestation of an antidemocratic sentiment normalized by the BJP government, session after session. This distressing trend, coupled with the obliteration of the Opposition's voice in Parliament and the swift enactment of Orwellian bills, threatens to cast a dark and enduring shadow on India's democratic history. As the fallout from these political manoeuvres unfolds, the ramifications are felt on multiple fronts. With unemployment soaring to historic highs, consumption expenditure hitting record lows and businesses witnessing a mass exodus, the palpable dissatisfaction of the common man remains unheard.

In the face of such stifling conditions within and outside Parliament, a ray of hope emerged with Rahul Gandhi's Bharat Jodo Yatra. The Yatra, seeking to bridge divides and connect with the citizens of India, resonated with the ideals envisioned by our forefathers. As the Opposition's voices are silenced, the streets become the arena to engage with the major stakeholders of democracy—the people. In this context, the Yatra stands as a beacon, reigniting the belief in the Idea of India, and the constitutional and democratic principles it was built upon.

The Bharat Jodo Yatra was met with great enthusiasm as it crossed through the varied landscapes of India. By the time it arrived in
