afternoon was spent discussing displacement. Displaced tribal communities shared their pain, highlighting how justice is never served to them despite so-called development. They don't benefit from electricity, roads or irrigation. Instead, their sacrifices, their livelihood, everything is taken away. They are distanced from their own forests. They cannot catch fish from their own ponds and rivers. The displacement of the community leads to a loss of habitat, their language becomes endangered and an entire civilization is destroyed. When no habitat is left, the Fifth Schedule provisions become irrelevant. Neither PESA nor forest rights has any meaning. The Narmada Bachao Andolan and other people's organizations also participated in this discussion. They were also part of the journey. Medha Patkar, Rajkumar Sinha and other activists joined. A serious discussion took place that afternoon. Tribal folk music and dances were also performed during this liberated cultural event, resonating with the echoes of 'Abua Raj (Our Rule)'.

The next destination of the Yatra was near Maheshwar Nagar. Maheshwar, the capital of Queen Ahilyabai Holkar, has a royal seat, a temple and a ghat on the Narmada river. The weaving of handlooms has been practised here since the sixth and seventh centuries. Beautiful cotton and silk sarees are prepared on the handloom. These sarees are known as Maheshwari sarees. The weavers had come to meet Rahul ji at this stop. Weavers need to preserve their traditional skills. They also have to face the challenges of today's circumstances. While they might withstand the competition from machine-made fabrics, dealing with the complexities of government policies is difficult for them. They have skill in their fingers, which is a constant sign of working on the loom. The weavers' delegation presented a woven saree to Rahul ji, created with finesse and love.

The sunwai (consultations) of big industrialists takes place easily, but no one listens to the weavers. On that very afternoon, small and medium local entrepreneurs from the industrial area near Pithampur, close to Indore, also came to meet. While the government organizes big industrial conferences to boost entrepreneurship, there is no attention to formulating a productivity policy. The harsh rules of GST are holding back small-scale
