Representatives of various communities from the backward classes participated in the afternoon discussion. Representatives elected from the blacksmith, carpenter, potter, boatman, weaver, oil presser and farmer communities were present. People from the nomadic tribal Banjara community were also present. From there, the discussion started to take shape for a caste-based census. The working class of the backward communities is being affected by land acquisition. Their industries and work are not getting encouragement. Ensuring representation to eliminate centuries of backwardness and inequality is crucial. In the era of privatization and commercialization, traditional professions are fading away. The dominance of the prosperous class is visible in every field. In such a situation, the marginalized community's voice is nowhere on the periphery. It is neither in policy formulation, nor in the judicial system.

Panchayat representatives said that new groups had been given political opportunities. But the flow of power transfer had come to a standstill. Without the transfer of power, creating new alternative politics, and social and economic conditions was impossible. Rajiv Gandhi ji had said in his lifetime that this was at least a one-generation task. Today, when centralization is happening unabated, initiating power transfer is a challenging task. As the journey progressed, physically disabled youth met Rahul ji. Many companions had travelled a considerable distance. It was inspiring to see how these youths, facing physical challenges, were so motivated.

We were reaching the last leg of the Yatra in Madhya Pradesh. Farmers joined us for a conversation. Discussions were held on the shortcomings of the crop insurance scheme, not getting fair prices, faulty policies on non-seasonal farming and the integration of agricultural products with industries. In the bordering villages of Madhya Pradesh, an elderly activist welcomed us by raising a flag. Suddenly, the heartbeats calmed down. The journey paid homage to him. After ending the journey of this world, he embarked towards an eternal journey.

It was time to bid farewell to Madhya Pradesh. I didn't realize how so many days had passed so quickly. In Madhya Pradesh there was a treasure
