As a teen, Snowden and some friends created a website called Ryuhana Press. Snowden was the web editor. On his profile page, Snowden wrote that he liked purple sunglasses, the Baltimore Orioles, the video game Tekken, and role-playing games. The website was taken down in June 2013, soon after stories about Snowden began appearing in the media.

the CIA, and in mid-2006, the agency offered him a job in computer networking in the global communications division at CIA headquarters in Langley, Virginia.

Even though he had not earned a college degree, Snowden's computer skills impressed his superiors enough that they sent him to the CIA's school for technology specialists. He took classes for six months, and then the CIA assigned him to the US mission to the United Nations in Geneva, Switzerland, in March 2007. He told NBC News that he was "trained as a spy in sort of the traditional sense of the word, in that I lived and worked undercover overseas—pretending to work in a job that I'm not—and even being assigned a name that was not mine."[2] His duties in Geneva included retrieving information about the Swiss banking industry. It would be the first time he found reason to distrust the US government.
