untested. Plus, he had not absolutely decided whether he would become a whistle-blower. He had much to consider. Once the top-secret documents were leaked, his life would never be the same. The government would paint him as a criminal, possibly a terrorist. He might be arrested and go to prison. For the time being, Snowden would gather evidence and weigh his options.

By his own account, Snowden was leading a pleasant life. He was making more than $120,000 a year and living in a comfortable rented house in Waipahu, Hawaii, with his girlfriend, Lindsay Mills.[4] Mills, a performance artist and graduate of the Maryland Institute College of Art, had been living with Snowden in Hawaii since June 2012. She wrote on her blog that he was her "man of mystery."[5]

JOURNALISM IN THE AGE OF SURVEILLANCE

Journalists such as Poitras and Greenwald take extra measures to protect sensitive data. In addition to using strong e-mail encryption programs, they use software that hides the websites they have visited. They limit the use of cell phones, which can show who the caller is speaking to and the caller's physical location. Cell phones can also be used as a listening device even when turned off. To prevent computers from being hacked, they use computers that are air-gapped, meaning the devices have never been connected to the Internet.
