HONG KONG

After working at Dell and Booz Allen Hamilton in 2012 and 2013, Snowden turned over approximately 50,000 top-secret documents.[1] His intention was to release the documents to his media partners, who would then release them to the world. With the last puzzle pieces falling into place, Snowden finally stepped into the role of whistle-blower.

Hawaii to Hong Kong

It was May 2013. After copying the remaining set of documents he wanted to disclose, Snowden told his supervisor at Booz Allen Hamilton he needed time off. He said he would be gone for a couple of weeks to get treatment for epilepsy. He was diagnosed with epilepsy in 2012. At home, he packed a bag and told his girlfriend, Mills, he was going on a business trip. He did not reveal the real reason for his trip or his destination, hoping to protect her from government harassment once his identity was revealed.

Although Snowden feared the consequences of his actions, he knew it was time to tell the truth.
