Greenwald. Snowden sent many secret documents via encrypted e-mail to Poitras and approximately 25 documents to Greenwald.[2] He asked them to come to Hong Kong immediately to meet with him and decide how they should move forward. Poitras and Greenwald agreed, and they arrived in Hong Kong on June 2.

After answering the journalists' questions and mutually deciding they could trust each other, the three came up with a plan. Snowden requested Greenwald release only one document at a time, rather than dump them all at once. He wanted people to fully digest each topic. With the assistance of fellow Guardian reporter Ewen MacAskill, Greenwald wrote separate articles about three leaked documents. They would wait to reveal

HONG KONG

Hong Kong, with a population of 7.2 million people, is located in the South China Sea in southeastern China. Once a British colony, it became a special administrative region of China in 1997. China agreed to give Hong Kong a high degree of autonomy under a principle it calls "one country, two systems."[3] The principle lets Hong Kong keep its economic and social systems as they are until 2047. The Hong Kong government is only somewhat democratic, in that citizens are allowed to vote for leaders only on a preapproved list. The region is a major banking and corporate center and has its own currency and trade regulations.
