Iceland. But he had no idea what his future held. He accepted that he might end up in prison. "You can't come up against the world's most powerful intelligence agencies and not accept the risk," he told a reporter. "If they want to get you, over time they will."[6] Snowden would try to put off the inevitable for as long as he could.

On June 9, the Guardian newspaper posted Greenwald's article and Poitras's video, revealing Snowden as the person who leaked the top-secret NSA documents. As the three had expected, attention now zeroed in on Snowden. Members of the media descended on Hong Kong trying to locate him. Greenwald and Poitras left the country. With the help of human rights lawyers, Snowden left the Mira hotel and fled to a safe house.

Seeking Asylum

In an interview with the South China Morning Post on July 9, Snowden said he wanted the people of China to decide his fate and he would "rather stay in Hong Kong and fight the United States government in the courts, because I have faith in Hong Kong's rule of law." He
