added he felt safe in the city and planned to stay until he was "asked to leave."[7]

Reports surfaced that Snowden was living at the Russian consulate. Rumors also swirled that he had been having meetings with the Russians, seeking temporary asylum. A spokesperson for Snowden, Anatoly Kucherena, who would later become his attorney, denied the allegations. However, in September 2013, Russian President Vladimir Putin stated Snowden had met with Russian diplomatic representatives while in Hong Kong. And a US government official told a US reporter that on three occasions, Snowden had
