telephone conversations of 35 world leaders. In a separate story, Der Spiegel reported the NSA had tapped German Chancellor Angela Merkel's cell phone.

The New York Times reported in November on an internal NSA report asserting US laws were not keeping up with the NSA's need for mass surveillance. The document laid out a four-year plan in which the NSA would eventually be allowed to access data from "anyone, anytime, anywhere."[8]

THE FIVE EYES

The NSA leaks revealed a secret communications alliance between five countries known as The Five Eyes: the United States, Canada, the United Kingdom, Australia, and New Zealand. Each of these countries has different laws and rules that govern surveillance. Depending on their intelligence needs, one country might find it useful to use the intelligence data of another member of the Five Eyes or have that country gather the intelligence for them.

In December 2013, the Guardian released a document showing the NSA was concerned terrorists might be secretly communicating through private chats and web forums of online computer games. The document proposed the surveillance and infiltration of multiplayer role-playing games.

More information on the leaks was revealed in early 2014, too. The Washington Post reported in January that the NSA was working to build a quantum computer that
