PRESENT AND FUTURE

By August 2015, Snowden had been living in Moscow for two years. Although he said in interviews he felt safe in Russia, he still feared he was being watched and monitored by the US government. He lived a quiet, modest lifestyle, learned a bit of the Russian language, and continued pursuing asylum in other countries. He even hoped to go home someday, even if that meant volunteering to go to prison.

"An Indoor Cat"

James Bamford, a reporter for Wired magazine, interviewed Snowden in Moscow in the summer of 2014. Bamford described Snowden as looking thin, almost gaunt, as if his clothes were a size too large. "Overall, he has the look of an earnest first-year grad student," Bamford observed.[1] Snowden said he lived off chips and ramen noodles and spent most of his time

In 2014, Poitras released the documentary Citizenfour, which is about Snowden's life.
