

In 2015, Snowden joined Twitter and quickly became an active participant.

indoors. He referred to himself as "an indoor cat."[2] Though located times zones away from the East Coast of the United States, Snowden lived on New York time to make it easier to e-mail colleagues and watch US news in real time.

Michael V. Hayden, former NSA and CIA director, predicted Snowden would become an alcoholic and waste away in Moscow similar to other Americans who had defected there. Snowden countered that he was not a defector, nor did he drink alcohol. To those who claimed he was being manipulated by Russian intelligence, Snowden insisted he had no relationship with the Russian government, nor had he entered into any agreements with them.
