Country	Date	Topic	Representative detail from Gray
Greece	5/9/17	Fiscal capacity in fragile states	"We commend staff and local stakeholders for the efforts deployed in ensuring continuity in surveillance and assistance often under very challenging circumstances."
India	3/24/98	Fund surveillance post–East Asian crisis	"I agree that there should be a periodic review of the policies of countries which may have a regional impact, particularly when there is a formal grouping of countries such as ASEA, SAARC, etc. …"
Turkey	5/29/15	Fiscal policy and long-term growth	"In addition to its analysis on energy subsidies, we wonder whether the Fund plans to revisit its work on other common subsidies with the view of taking stock of recent experience in member countries and providing reform options."

The content of Grays underscores their significance. Table 6.1 provides examples of these documents, including submissions from populist-led countries. These statements demonstrate a focus on substantive economic deliberations rather than public grandstanding. Our interviews with IMF staff corroborate this, highlighting that Grays are rarely used as a platform for IMF-bashing.[7] To validate this claim, we conduct sentiment analysis in subsequent sections.

Our analysis draws on approximately 55,000 Grays from the IMF Archives Online, covering the period 1987–2017. These documents encompass the IMF's global membership and represent the complete set of declassified Grays available under the IMF Open Archives Policy.

The primary dependent variable is the annual count of Grays submitted by a country or constituency leader. While constituencies often comprise multiple countries, we attribute Grays to the leading country, as its ED drafts
