Despite the film's global scope, the majority of the scenes were shot in Atlanta. The challenge of physically replicating Nigeriain the American South wwas left to Owen Paterson and his team. "For a moment, we were going to shoot in Puerto Rico to double Lagos—climate-wise, they're very similar, and the shape of the cities are fairly similar, as they both have water elements in the body of the city," Paterson says. Ultimately we went to Atlanta, so we shifted gears.

"The Atlanta Civic Center turned out to be a really good location for us. Tonally, it felt like it lived in the world of Lagos, at least the Lagos that we had researched. The Civic Center isn't a huge hub of activity in Atlanta, so we were able to go in and dress the elements that didn't feel enough like Lagos—for instance, putting in planters with vegetation that is appropriate to the region of Lagos versus what's in Atlanta. We could then take the existing structure and build on it practically and through visual effects to make it look as authentic as possible."

 Manuel Plaph-Jorge keyframe.