"The Triskelion is sort of Pentagon-meets-a-modern-building, so it's not as low-hanging and dated as the Pentagon structure," Moore says. "It's taller than any building in D.C. We break the D.C. rules about height limits, so the Triskelion lords over the rest of the skyline. It is something that is of the city. And in the stonework, texturally, it feels like it's part of the Capitol and Smithsonian and all those structures—but it's newer, a little slicker, and a little more modern."

Carson was tasked with dressing the entrance environment to match the rest of the Triskelion. "The entranceway illustration is based on the actual location where the scene was to be shot," he says.
