

Working with Director of Photography Matty Libatique, Saunders hit on an idea in which lights were installed behind slits in the ceiling so that the light source was always invisible (above). Further adornments for the living-room space, like the cascading wall of water (right), were a design element approached with great difficulty — but with inevitable success — by the film's visual-effects crew.

