

The teaser image took prominence over other early efforts that showed Stark laboring over his mask in the confines of his Workshop (above). Greenstein felt this part of the character's narrative — the transformation from normal person to super hero — was better leveraged in commercials and movie trailers rather than print. Thus, the half mask teaser was settled on to make the introduction between a curious public and Iron Man. And as history now tells us, that introduction went smoothly. Very, very smoothly.