Favreau: "Sam Jackson has tremendous screen presence. Just the idea that we stuck him in the first one was a bit of a lark, and now you know, much like when we said 'I am Iron Man', some decisions that were made flippantly in the first one ended up determining our whole path in the second. We wanted his energy to be that of like a grizzled, AA sponsor who has sort of been there and was going to confront him with the truth about his dad, who clearly Tony has got a conflicted memory and relationship with."
