* The point is not that what happens to a cold teaspoon in a cup of hot tea depends on whether I have a blurred vision of it or not. What happens to the spoon and to its molecules as well, obviously, does not depend on how I view it. It just happens, regardless. The point is that the description in terms of heat, temperature, and the passage of heat from tea to spoon is a blurred vision of what happens, and that it is only in this blurred vision that a startling difference between past and future appears.