All the characters in Interstellar are convinced that bulk beings exist, though they use that name only rarely. Usually, the characters call the bulk beings "They." A reverential They. Early in the movie, Amelia Brand says to Cooper, "And whoever They are, They appear to be looking out for us. That wormhole lets us travel to other stars. It came along right as we needed it."

One of Christopher Nolan's clever and intriguing ideas is to imagine that They are actually our descendants: humans who, in the far future, evolve to acquire an additional space dimension and live in the bulk. Late in the movie, Cooper says to TARS, "Don't you get it yet, TARS? They aren't beings. They're us, trying to help, just like I tried to help Murph." TARS responds, "People didn't build this tesseract" (in which Cooper is riding; Chapter 29). "Not yet," Cooper says, "but one day. Not you and me but people, people who've evolved beyond the four dimensions we know."

Cooper, Brand, and the crew of the Endurance never actually feel or see our bulk descendants' gravity or their space warps and whirls. That, if it ever occurs, is left for a sequel to Interstellar. But older Cooper himself, riding through the bulk in the closing tesseract of Chapter 30, reaches out to the Endurance's crew and his younger self, reaches out through the bulk, reaches out gravitationally. Brand feels and sees his presence, and thinks he is They.

---

36 Widely available on the web. See, for example, the end of the article "Flatland" on Wikipedia.