helping. The mother has everything to gain, while the daughter herself will have no inducement to resist her mother's manipulation because she is genetically indifferent between the available choices.

Once again, it is important to stress that this has been an 'other things being equal' kind of argument. Even though other things will usually not be equal, Charnov's reasoning could still be useful to Alexander or anyone else advocating a parental manipulation theory. In any case, Alexander's practical arguments for expecting parental victory—parents being bigger, stronger, and so on—are well taken.
